INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

In its September 21, 2021 order, the Court requested supplemental briefing to address how Hernández v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020), applies in this case. Order (Sept. 21, 2021). Appellant Blake Bradley respectfully submits this supplemental brief in response to that order.

The Supreme Court in Hernández explained that constitutional separation-of-powers concerns require courts “to exercise caution before extending” the judicially crafted damages remedy in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), to a new context. Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 739. Out of “respect for the separation of powers,” the Court declined to create a damages remedy in that case, which concerned claims against a Border Patrol agent stemming from a cross-border-shooting incident. Id. at 749.

This Court may reach a similar conclusion here. Although Officer Bradley did not appeal the issue, the availability of a Bivens remedy is an “antecedent” question, Hernández v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2006 (2017) (quotations omitted), and if the Court takes up the issue—as it may sua sponte, see Bistrain v. Levi, 912 F.3d 79, 89 (3d Cir. 2018)—the Court must consider at the outset whether the constitutional concerns discussed in Hernández and other cases warrant creating such a remedy here.

The district court correctly recognized that this case presents a new context, but it nevertheless allowed plaintiff to proceed under a new judicially created damages remedy, without the guidance of the Supreme Court’s most recent Hernández decision.

The decisions the court relied on to reach that conclusion have since been overturned or are, at best, of questionable validity—which could prompt this Court to address the issue at the outset, and to determine that separation-of-powers concerns counsel against creating a new cause of action for damages against a federal official in his individual capacity.

ARGUMENT

APPLYING HERNÁNDEZ V. MESA, THIS COURT MAY DECLINE TO CREATE A NEW CAUSE OF ACTION IN THIS CASE.

A. In Hernández v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020), the Supreme Court repeated its now-familiar refrain that the cause of action recognized in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), was the product of an “ancien regime,” during which the Court “routinely inferred” causes of action that were not otherwise textually explicit. Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 741 (quoting Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1855 (2017)). But the Court later “came to appreciate” that judicially creating a claim for damages “risks arrogating legislative power,” and “may upset the careful balance of interests struck by the lawmakers.” Id. at 741-42.

Expanding Bivens is now “a disfavored judicial activity,” as “Congress is best positioned to evaluate whether . . . monetary and other liabilities should be imposed upon” federal officers. Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 742 (quotations omitted). Indeed, following Bivens, the Supreme Court has recognized a Bivens remedy in only two cases—the most recent of which was decided more than 40 years ago. See Davis v.

Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979) (former congressional staffer’s alleged Fifth Amendment violation based on a gender-based dismissal); Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980) (federal prisoner’s alleged Eighth Amendment violation for failure to provide adequate medical care).

Before recognizing a Bivens remedy, a court must perform a “two-step inquiry”: the court must first consider whether the claim arises in a “new context” and then determine whether any “special factors” counsel hesitation before extending Bivens to that new context. Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 743 (quotations omitted). A context is “new” if it differs in any “meaningful way” from the Supreme Court’s prior Bivens decisions. Id. (quotations omitted). And in assessing whether special factors provide a reason not to extend Bivens, the Supreme Court has emphasized that separation-of-powers principles are “central to [this] analysis.” Id. (quoting Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. at 1857). A court must assess “the risk of interfering with the authority of the other branches”; whether Congress “might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy”; and “whether the Judiciary is well suited . . . to consider and weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed.” Id. (quotations omitted). Hernández specifically considered whether a new claim “implicates an element of national security,” and whether Congress had “address[ed] related matters,” id. at 746-49; and the Court specifically noted that because agents’ conduct “at the border has a clear and strong connection to national security,” creating a new Bivens claim for that conduct “risk[s] . . . undermining border security,” id. at 746-47.

Following Hernández, courts of appeals have declined to extend Bivens in a number of cases. The Fifth Circuit recently declined to create a new damages remedy simply because “separation of powers counsels against extending Bivens,” and “Congress did not make individual officers statutorily liable for excessive-force or unlawful-detention claims.” Byrd v. Lamb, 990 F.3d 879, 882 (5th Cir. 2021) (per curiam) (quotations omitted); see also, e.g., Callahan v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 965 F.3d 520, 524 (6th Cir. 2020) (declining to extend Bivens in a prison setting because “separation of powers concerns counsel a policy of judicial restraint” (quotations omitted)); Davis v. Samuels, 962 F.3d 105, 112 (3d Cir. 2020) (similar); Mammana v. Barben, 856 F. App’x 411, 415 (3d Cir. 2021) (unpublished) (explaining that recognizing “a broad new category of claims” against “federal prison officials for unconstitutional conditions of confinement . . . would step well into the lawmaking privilege”).

Indeed, courts have explained that judicially created causes of action could interfere with executive policy and functions, contravening the separation of powers. See, e.g., Annappareddy v. Pascale, 996 F.3d 120, 137 (4th Cir. 2021) (declining to extend Bivens because new claims might “interfere [with] the executive branch’s investigative and prosecutorial functions”); Ahmed v. Weyker, 984 F.3d 564, 570 (8th Cir. 2020) (similar, where newly recognized claims could “burden[] and interfer[e] with the executive branch’s investigative . . . functions” (quotations omitted)); Boudette v. Buffington, No. 20-1329, 2021 WL 3626752, at *5 (10th Cir. Aug. 17, 2021)

(unpublished) (similar, for claims that could interfere with the relationships between private citizens, law enforcement, and prosecutors).

B. As the Supreme Court and this Court have recognized, the Court is free to consider the ““antecedent”” question of whether separation-of-powers concerns counsel against extending a Bivens remedy in an interlocutory appeal of a district court’s denial of qualified immunity. See Callahan, 965 F.3d at 526. Although Officer Bradley has not appealed the district court’s earlier decision extending Bivens, this Court may consider that antecedent question sua sponte. If it does so, it should conclude that, in light of Hernández, special factors counsel hesitation in creating a new Bivens remedy here.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly chosen to address the threshold inquiry of whether to create a Bivens remedy, even if the issue was not addressed in the lower courts. Indeed, when Hernández was first before the Supreme Court, the plaintiffs sought the Court’s review of the Fifth Circuit’s grant of qualified immunity to the defendant officers. But in granting review, the Court ordered the parties to brief whether a “claim . . . may be asserted under Bivens,” even though that question was not raised in the petition for certiorari, see Hernández v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 291 (2016). The Court then held that the availability of a Bivens remedy is “antecedent” to the question of qualified immunity. Hernández v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2006 (2017) (quotations omitted); see also, e.g., Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 672-73 (2009) (explaining that on interlocutory appeal of a district court’s denial of qualified immunity, the court of appeals may also consider whether to extend Bivens); Wilkie v. Robbins, 551 U.S. 537, 549 n.4 (2007) (“[T]he recognition of [a] cause of action” is “directly implicated by the defense of qualified immunity” and properly before a court in an interlocutory appeal. (quotations omitted)).

The Third Circuit has accordingly explained that it could sua sponte consider the availability of a Bivens remedy “even when a defendant does not raise the issue.” Bistrrian v. Levi, 912 F.3d 79, 89 (3d Cir. 2018) (citing Carlson, 446 U.S. at 17 n.2 (A court may consider whether to extend Bivens even though the issue was “not presented below.”)). And the Fifth Circuit has noted that it could address whether to extend Bivens, even if a defendant officer “did not even raise the Bivens issue in the district court.” Byrd, 990 F.3d at 882; see also Oliva v. Nivar, 973 F.3d 438, 443 n.2 (5th Cir. 2020) (“Because Bivens is a judicially crafted remedy, a court asked to extend Bivens has a concomitant responsibility to ask whether there are any special factors that counsel hesitation about granting the extension,” regardless whether the defendant officer had adequately preserved the argument. (quotations omitted)).

The district court correctly held that this case presents a new context, thus requiring consideration of the special-factors inquiry. MTD Op., RE 46, PageID ## 683-88. But the district court nevertheless created a new damages remedy, and that court notably considered various special factors before the Supreme Court issued its most-recent Hernández decision. If the Court takes up the Bivens issue, both national security concerns and Congress’s frequent, pervasive regulation of immigration suggest that the Court should be sensitive to the separation of powers and “exercise caution” before extending Bivens. Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 739.

1. The Supreme Court has never recognized a Fifth Amendment claim for unlawful civil detention conditions, nor has the Court considered whether to create a Bivens remedy based on federal officials’ conduct at border facilities. As the district court correctly concluded, those differences are sufficiently meaningful for this case to present a new context. MTD Op., RE 46, PageID # 684 (comparing Carlson, 446 U.S. 14, with Correctional Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61 (2001)); see also Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. at 1855, 1859-60 (discussing prior circumstances in which the Court “approved” a new Bivens remedy). There can be no doubt that plaintiff’s Fifth Amendment conditions-of-confinement claim arises in a new context.

2. Because this case presents a new Bivens context, if the Court takes up the Bivens question, it must consider whether special factors counsel hesitation before creating a damages remedy.

The district court recognized a new Bivens damages remedy without the benefit of the Supreme Court’s guidance in Hernández. And the district court relied on decisions that are no longer good law, primarily invoking the Ninth Circuit’s reasoning in Rodriguez v. Swartz, 899 F.3d 719, 746 (9th Cir. 2018), in which that court had extended a Bivens remedy to circumstances similar to those in Hernández itself—a cross-border shooting. See MTD Op., RE 46, PageID # 687. But the Supreme Court vacated and remanded the Ninth Circuit’s Rodriguez decision in light of Hernández, see Swartz v. Rodriguez, 140 S. Ct. 1258 (2020), and the Rodriguez suit has since been dismissed with prejudice, see Order, Rodriguez v. Unknown Parties, No. 4:14-cv-2251 (D. Ariz., July 9, 2020), Doc. 72; see also Quintero Perez v. United States, 8 F.4th 1095, 1106-07 (9th Cir. 2021) (declining to extend Bivens in a case substantively identical to Rodriguez). As relevant here, however, the Ninth Circuit explained in Rodriguez that it could consider whether to extend Bivens, even if the defendant officer had failed to timely raise that argument. Rodriguez, 899 F.3d at 735.

The district court additionally cited Linlor v. Polson, 263 F. Supp. 3d 613, 625 (E.D. Va. 2017), in which an airline passenger brought a Bivens action against a Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officer, claiming that the officer violated the Fourth Amendment by using excessive force during an airport security screening. See MTD Op., RE 46, PageID ## 687-88. But shortly after that decision was issued, the Third Circuit refused to extend Bivens in materially indistinguishable circumstances: allegedly unconstitutional actions by a TSA officer during an airport security screening. Vanderklok v. United States, 868 F.3d 189, 209 (3d Cir. 2017) (“[T]he role of the TSA in securing public safety is so significant that we ought not create a damages remedy in this context.”); see also Pellegrino v. TSA, 937 F.3d 164, 180 (3d Cir. 2019) (en banc) (reaffirming the holding in Vanderklok).

Contrary to the district court, the separation-of-powers concerns cited by the Supreme Court in Hernández counsel that Bivens should not be extended here, even though Officer Bradley has not appealed that issue. The Supreme Court expressed particular caution with respect to extending Bivens in contexts associated with border enforcement: “the conduct of agents positioned at the border has a clear and strong connection to national security,” and “the risk of undermining border security provides reason to hesitate before extending Bivens into this field.” Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 746-47. And the Fifth Circuit recently suggested that Hernández “strongly implies that proximity to the border alone is sufficient to qualify as a ‘new context’ in which Bivens is unavailable.” Angulo v. Brown, 978 F.3d 942, 948 n.3 (5th Cir. 2020). And even before the Supreme Court’s decision in Hernández, the Fourth Circuit had declined to extend Bivens in a case concerning immigration enforcement—not specifically tied to activity at the border—recognizing that such enforcement has “the natural tendency to affect diplomacy, foreign policy, and the security of the nation, which . . . counsel hesitation in extending Bivens.” Tun-Cos v. Perrotte, 922 F.3d 514, 526 (4th Cir. 2019) (quotations omitted), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2565 (2020).

Additionally, Congress has enacted a comprehensive and reticulated statutory regime authorizing Customs and Border Protection (CBP) enforcement activities, which the agency has implemented through extensive regulation, and which also counsels against creating a judicially imposed damages remedy that “interfer[es] with the authority of the other branches.” Hernández, 140 S. Ct. at 743.¹ Congress also

And for CBP’s authorities under the Immigration and Nationality Act, see, e.g., 8 U.S.C. § 1357(a); 8 C.F.R. §§ 287.5, 287.8, 287.9, 287.10. Congress has also provided regularly considers changes to CBP’s authorities, see, e.g., Border Zone Reasonableness Restoration Act of 2019, S. 2180, 116th Cong., which may further “indicate that Congress did not want a money damages remedy against” CBP officers for their allegedly wrongful conduct. Tun-Cos, 922 F.3d at 527 (listing recent amendments to the immigration statutes).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons and the reasons discussed in the government’s plenary briefs, the judgment of the district court should be reversed.
